

Entrepreneurs are often unconventional thinkers. But for Dr. Allan Kirkendall, the unconventional had been part of his professional life even before he launched his own company. For 26 years, he has been a clinical psychologist helping veterans recover from the effects of today's unconventional warfare. Of course, his job created stress for Allan himself. His release? Music. And music became the catalyst for his solution to a problem so common, conventional thinking was to just accept it. Picnicking at a jazz concert in Roseburg, Oregon, one night, Allan and his wife, Sheryl, grew frustrated whenever they tried to balance their wine glasses on the grass without spilling their wine. Allan suddenly saw this as an opportunity—not just to reduce their dry cleaning bills, but also to create something new. Several prototypes later, the world's first stabilizing "wine stem" was born. Simple yet elegant, Allan's WineStem is sold online and at music festivals all over the Northwest. In addition to running the company, Allan and his wife also raise alpacas. Dogs or cats would have been too conventional.
